

Gendering Green Criminology

Call for Titles and Abstracts

Editors: Pamela Davies, James Heydon, Emma Milne, Kay Peggs, Tanya Wyatt

Email 200-word abstract on or before May 31st 2021 to tanya.wyatt@northumbria.ac.uk

Since its inception in the 1990s, green criminology has done much to draw attention to a wide array of environmental harms, green crimes and other patterns of under-studied victimisation at the local, national and international levels. Gaining increasing relevance in a world where environmental concerns are coming to occupy social, political and economic agendas, green criminology is well-positioned to address the various environmental harms as they relate to humans and non-humans alike. However, one of the major areas where attention is both lacking and urgently needed is at the intersections between green criminology, feminism and gender-focussed analysis of crime and deviance. How can feminism and a critical gender approach engage meaningfully with environmental harm? Why should those interested in environmental harm also be concerned with gender? What are the implications of gender on environmental harms? In what ways can a gender-focussed lens provide greater insight into the nature and impact of gendered harms? It is unanswered questions such as these that this edited collection seeks to address. Presenting a dialogue that connects international scholarship from a diverse range of disciplines, this edited collection will make a significant contribution to our understanding of the intersections between gender and environmental harm.

We invite contributions related to the themes below. These are broad indicative themes only, and we are interested in all dimensions related to the intersections between environmental harms and gender-focussed analysis, including theoretical and empirical work which explores this area.

- Gender and perpetrators of environmental harms
- Gender and victims of environmental harms
- Eco-feminism and justice
- Feminist approaches to environmental harm
- Gendered nature of structural violence and environmental harm
- Interactions between gender and environmental harms
- Gender, environmental catastrophe, resilience and recovery

We have interest from and are working with Bristol University Press to develop a book proposal. The editors warmly welcome submissions from academics and researchers on the topic of gender and green criminology. Please submit a 200-word abstract of your proposed chapter to tanya.wyatt@northumbria.ac.uk on or before May 31st 2021. If your proposed abstract is accepted, you will be asked to complete a first draft of a chapter by the end of March 2022. Accepted chapters must not be previously published. All manuscripts will be subject to a peer-review process before they are finally accepted for publication. Launch of the book is planned for March 2023.

Timeline

Deadline for abstracts	End of May 2021
Author first drafts due	End of March 2022
Book Launch	March 2023